

I, Adam Reider, do not know how to read, write, or speak english.

That is the mentality I want you to understand for yourselves.

Because English is an imperfect application, there is no one person who can tell you how best to read, write, or speak it. The only person that you should convince yourself to be better at it is you. And, what better way to recognize betterment than to admit that you need to do better? So if I can say it, then you can say it.

All students do not know how to read, write, or speak english.

If one of them did, then english would have only one way of doing it. The remarkable thing is: there is an infinite amount of ways to do english.

Remember that, learn from that, and be a better person because of that. We are wrong because we haven't yet tried all the ways to do english that exist.

The majority of students in the 1930's failed to satisfy the requirements of being well read, spoken, and written. That is still true today. That is to say, as long as you get complimented that you read, speak, or write well then you will be more successful than other people. It is definitely a requirement that all jobs require at least excellence in one of those three categories for people to be successful and among the best in that job. If you do not want to be successful in a job, then know that even being a successful person requires the use of one of those skills in some language and especially english in america.

All teachers do not know how to speak, read, or write english.

From that we can know that the teachers we learn from are imperfect. I am not the best source for learning english. However, I have been complimented many times that I speak and write it well. Reading is the most elusive of the three and the one that earns the highest honor.

No one will ever know how to speak, read, or write english. We can only try.

The encouraging thing is: your improvement through trying will be better than what most people are naturally capable of, which is where they limit themselves at.
